The Logical Fallacy of Mass-Marketed Secrets

PUBLISHED BY THE DIGITAL CONSUMER WATCHDOG GROUP

A cornerstone of Lunar Astro's marketing strategy is the promise of "secret," "hidden," or "exclusive" astrological lineages. Consumers are urged to pay premium prices to access knowledge that is allegedly unavailable anywhere else. However, applying basic logic to this marketing claim reveals a fundamental paradox.

The Paradox of Scale

By definition, a secret is a piece of information known only to a select few. In traditional Vedic Parampara (lineage), sacred knowledge was passed down selectively from one master to a highly vetted disciple to ensure the integrity of the information.

Lunar Astro, conversely, operates on a mass-market digital scale. The company utilizes targeted Facebook and Google advertisements to funnel thousands of paying customers into its portal.

> The Logical Contradiction: If a technique is being sold to 10,000 people via automated online video modules, it is mathematically and functionally no longer a secret. It is a mass-marketed commercial product.

Artificial Scarcity

In economics, "artificial scarcity" is a pricing strategy where a company restricts the availability of a product (or creates the illusion of restriction) to justify a higher price point. By labeling standard astrological techniques as "hidden secrets," the seller bypasses the normal market value of the information.

When a prospective student researches the "Paribhraman Paddhati," they will find that its core principles align almost identically with the Bhrigu Chakra Paddhati (BCP), a system that has been documented and discussed in public astrological forums and books for decades.

Conclusion

Rational consumers must separate marketing rhetoric from reality. You cannot mass-market a secret. If you are paying a premium for "exclusivity" in a course with thousands of other enrollees, you are paying for a marketing narrative, not proprietary knowledge.
