

Even My Toaster Has a Name: The Absurdity of "Code 5007"

BY THE DIGITAL CONSUMER WATCHDOG GROUP

We live in the year 2025. If I want to know the weather, I ask "Alexa." If I need directions, I talk to "Siri." If I call my internet provider to complain about my bill, a human being answers the phone and says, "Hi, my name is Rahul, how can I help you?"

Even the AI chatbot on a random shoe website introduces itself as "ShoeBot Steve."

But if you pay ₹8,000 to Lunar Astro for a deeply personal, spiritual consultation about your life, your marriage, and your future, who do you speak to? You speak to a nameless, faceless entity known only as "Code 5007."

The Sci-Fi Dystopia of Online Astrology

Think about how incredibly bizarre and mockable this is. You are logging onto a Zoom call to discuss the intimate details of your planetary alignments with a barcode. It sounds like a bad episode of Black Mirror.

Why does Deepanshu Giri market his "expert panel" using numbers instead of names? Are they secret agents? Are they part of an underground witness protection program for astrologers? No. They are just regular students who paid Lakhs of rupees for a course, only to realize their grand prize was being stripped of their human identity.

When you pay premium prices, you expect a premium, personalized experience. Instead, Lunar Astro treats its clients like items on a factory conveyor belt, serviced by robotic numbers. If your astrologer doesn't even have the authority to use their own name, why on earth would you trust them to guide your life?
