

Hiding in Plain Sight: Why "Code 500X" is a Massive Red Flag

BY THE DIGITAL CONSUMER WATCHDOG GROUP

In any professional industry—whether it is medicine, law, therapy, or consulting—trust is built on accountability. If a doctor gives you bad advice, you know their name. If a lawyer misrepresents you, you can report them to the bar association.

So why does Lunar Astro, an academy that claims to be the pinnacle of astrological accuracy, hide its consultants behind anonymous numbers like "Code 5007"?

The Shield of Anonymity

The answer is simple: Liability and Accountability.

When a client pays ₹8,000 for a consultation and receives a terrible, inaccurate reading, who do they complain about? They can't leave a review saying, "Ravi Sharma gave me a bad reading." They can only complain about "Code 5007."

This system is highly suspicious. It allows Deepanshu Giri to completely insulate his personal brand from the failures of his students. If a consultation goes wrong, the Guru isn't blamed—the nameless, faceless "Code" is blamed. And because the Code has no public profile, the negative review vanishes into the void.

Furthermore, how can a consumer verify the credentials of "Code 5007"? You cannot look up their past work, their independent reviews, or their experience level. You are forced to blindly trust the corporation. In the digital age, a professional who refuses to give you their real name is not a professional—they are a massive, glaring red flag.
